

The proposal of implementing a 9 PM curfew and drastic service cuts on SEPTA could significantly impact riders. Such measures might lead to reduced accessibility, especially for those who rely on public transportation outside of typical work hours. These changes could disproportionately affect essential workers and those with non-traditional working hours, resulting in longer wait times, overcrowded transportation, and potentially higher costs if alternative transportation is needed.

Moreover, service cuts could lead to diminished rider safety and convenience, making public transportation less reliable and possibly prompting a decline in overall ridership. This situation might also exacerbate traffic congestion and environmental issues as more people might resort to using personal vehicles if public transit becomes less viable.

Overall, the negative repercussions of service reductions and curfews could extend beyond individual inconveniences, affecting the broader community and local economy.
